Account automation: where we are

Do these three this week. Each takes under an hour.

1. Give the four unassigned items from Monday's call an owner: audit report forms and tax rules, GST reconciliation checks, GST number validation, entity matching. All four need a chartered accountant, and nothing else on the build list moves until someone owns them.
2. Pick the name. Khatā or Munim. The landing page is already public under one of them.
3. Fix or unpublish the landing page headline. The call agreed AI stays in the background (58:15). The page currently says "Your books, closed by AI."

Decided so far

We are an AI-native CA firm. Services as software, high revenue per person. That rules out selling software to other firms, and rules out shipping an ERPNext add-on.

A partner CA signs, not Sumit, paid per signature by work type. Signing capacity becomes something we buy rather than a fixed ceiling.

What those two decisions cost us

Per-signature pay makes review time a cost to the signer, so we are paying someone to sign quickly and not look. Track the share of filings the signer sends back. If that number goes to zero, the review is not real.

Revenue per person is clients per person times fee per client, and automation only moves the first number. At a ₹10,000 monthly fee we need roughly 42 clients per person. At ₹25,000, roughly 17. Those are different businesses and we have not picked one.

The scope problem

Monday's call added inventory with expiry and weight loss, income tax and ITR, statutory audit, Companies Act reports, a tax knowledge base built on rulings and case law, Hindi support, and company formation.

Each addition makes sense on its own. Together they are several years of work, and today we have no clients and an empty repository.

The riskiest one is the tax knowledge base. The call itself noted that case law is often ambiguous. A wrong tax position, signed by a CA who is paid per signature, is the worst thing we could build.

Eleven questions still open

The four that block the most:

1. Volume or premium? This sets everything else.
2. Who owns getting clients 50 through 300?
3. Does the client engage us, or the signing CA's firm? This needs a lawyer and an ICAI read, so it should start now rather than wait.
4. What does a signature cost per work type, and how much review time does that buy?

Where things are

`DECISIONS.md` in the account-automation repo has the full version, including the reconciliation of the memo, the landing page and Monday's call in section 9. The site `ca.localhost` is up with ERPNext installed. No product code is written yet, deliberately.

Next: pick an owner for item 1 and reply with the name.
